Statement from the Colorado Oil & Gas Association on Alleged Findings in CU School of Public Health Study

Lisa McKenzie's previous work was questioned by state health officials; COGA will review her latest findings

DENVER (February 15, 2017) – Statement from the Colorado Oil & Gas Association (COGA) regarding the allegations in University of Colorado School of Public Health study:

“This is a very serious allegation. If you recall, Lisa McKenzie’s last major study in 2014 was disavowed by state health officials and in fact the state’s top health official went so far as to say the public could be “misled” by it. University researchers shouldn’t be in the game of scaring people just to secure additional funding. Still, public health is obviously of great concern to our industry and we will review her data immediately. We also look forward to the state’s review of the study.”
